THE NEWSPAPER.

We copy, and adopt, from the Norfolk Journal, the following article-which we hope our friends and readers may fully appreciate-and

Very few families and no business men in this go-ahead age will consent to do without the daily local newspaper.

This is indispensable, not only for the gratification of the family at home, but especially for the information of the merchant and trading man.

Events crowd so thick one upon another, and the prices for money, lands and merchandise are so sensitively affected by the political movements of the world, as to render quick and constant communication with the great commercial centres, a matter of the first importance.

To effect this, a large amount of money would be expended if such information could only be obtained by personal telegraphing. What it would cost to send the smallest message along the wires, would be sufficient to furnish the family with information for a month. This excludes the vast amount of local, political and general news, served up to the subscribers to a daily newspaper.

But the above classes are not alone interested in the publication of daily papers. The farmer and trucker may, from a single paragraph, often glean information which will repay them in a season ten fold the price of a year's subscription. The same remark applies to the mechanic and workingman, leaving out of view the pleasure derived by them from L. having a comprehensive digest of the news of the day spread before them during the space of a week, at a less expenditure than would be required to purchase a fragrant Havana.

There is another, and perhaps, the most interesting portion of a daily to which we have not adverted. We allude to the advertising columns. In them will be found houses for rent; dry goods, groceries, and merchandise of every description, as well as lands and tenements for sale; situations asked for; and la borers wanted; the arrival and departures of steamboats, railway trains, and sailing vessels. In fact, a complete budget of information, suited to every business and calling, can be possessed by a ten minutes' perusal of the local paper, without which it would take an individual a month to acquire. We have omitted to mention the influence for good, of a conservative and well conducted paper, upon the community: the capital which is thus attracted to the point of publication; the advocacy of its local interests and improve ments; the convenience it supplys of communicating important schemes to remote and distant points, and other sections of the State with which our interest may be identical. Many persons overlook these facts, while some content themselves with criticising the conduct of a paper, which, perhaps, is daily borrowed from a poor but intelligent and literal neighbor, to the annoyance of the entire family for which the paper is taken; or, it may be, they fail to pay the carrier for what they themselves acknowledge to be necessary to every well-regulated household.

Notwithstanding the defection of these two classes—the borrowers and those who fail to pay the publisher—there is a large number of persons, true friends of the press, who understand its importance and give it a noble and generous support.

With many thanks to this class, and a hope for the speedy amendment of the others, we shall continue our labors to make our paper desirable to the whole community. - Norfolk Journal.
